SDM-200 Cash Deposit Machine Awarded Color Universal Design CertificationAnnouncing Color Universal Design certified SDM-200 cash deposit machine for bank lobbies

GLORY's SDM-200 cash deposit machine has recently received the Color Universal Design Organization's Color Universal Design (CUD) certification, for the first time in the currency handling machine industry. The SDM-200 machine was launched in April 2009 and designed for lobbies of financial institutions to enable customers to make large cash deposits without assistance.

In recent years, to accommodate visitors with a range of physical disabilities, barrier free and universal design features have become a part of an increasing number of items available at public facilities and many other establishments. In this regard, many CUD-based initiatives are also being implemented to accommodate diverse needs in terms of the way people perceive color. Indeed, certain genetic variations and other factors cause some people to perceive color differently from others. There are reportedly over 200 million people worldwide, often referred to as color-blind, who see color differently from the general population.

Recent advances in technology that enable printing of brilliant colors have resulted in a flood of items featuring textual and graphical elements using myriad colors. As a result, more importance is now being placed on designing visual elements, particularly elements that convey life-saving information such as emergency guidance and warning signs and indicators that help avert accidents, so that such information is more accessible to those who see colors differently.

GLORY strives to create environmental-friendly products that also accord with our policy of creating designs that are people-friendly as well. Accordingly, we intend to extend our design process to include CUD design concepts in our future products.
